Jackie Robinson was born in 1919 to a very poor family. At age 26 he began playing baseball in the African American League. At that time, black people were not allowed to do most things with white people—not even play sports. But in 1946, the Brooklyn Dodgers asked Jackie to be the first African-American player in the Major League. He became a role model for black Americans and was named Rookie of the Year. However, many white people treated him badly and shouted mean things at him. This stopped when one of his white teammates put his arm around him to show they were friends. Jackie gained many fans because he was a great player. Because of him, more black players joined the league. After retiring from baseball, Jackie worked to improve black Americans' lives. He succeeded in many things, such as becoming the first black vice president of a big company. His strength in overcoming difficulties made him a hero to many people.
