Tebelis and his father lived long ago in Greece. The father was a miller and worked very hard, but Tebelis did not. People called him the laziest boy in Greece. One day when his father was away, soldiers came to the mill. One was King Alexander. He told Tebelis he had one week to mill a lot of grain. Tebelis knew this was impossible because they only had one sick cow. The next day, Tebelis told his father. His father wanted to get the task done and started to turn the mill himself. Tebelis joined him, but at the end of one day, it was clear they could not get it done in time. That night Tebelis dreamed of a way to make a watermill using the river near their house. The next day he got his father to help him build it. It worked, and they were able to turn all the grain into flour. The King approved of the invention and renamed Tebelis "Nestor," which means "wise one."
